Artists, museum join to support land trust

By FRANCES MOODY
JACKSON HOLE DAILY

Kathryn Turner has spent a big part of her life painting the valley's scenery.

Wanting to give back to the places that help her create her impressionistic paintings, Turner approached the Jackson Hole Land Trust, an organization that protects the valley's open spaces.

The roots of Turner's first meeting with the nonprofit have grown into an art project to help the trust in its work.

Throughout the summer and fall of 2014, six artists visited and painted 16 Jackson Hole Land Trust-protected properties in Teton County and one outside Dubois.

The results are now hanging on the walls of the National Museum of Wildlife Art for the "View22: Painting Jackson Hole's Open Spaces" exhibit.

The exhibit "helps to highlight that the valley's open spaces are there by design," said Laurie Andrews, the land trust's executive director. "It's great to have an artist show that even one tree in an open space can be stunning and artistic."

The show will hang through Dec. 21. To celebrate its opening the museum is hosting "Mix'd Media: View22" from 7 to 10 p.m. today. Admission to the event is $5. Museum members can attend for free.

In addition to highlighting the artists' interpretations of the protected lands the event will have activities hosted by the View22 painters.

Turner's station will be an adaptation of the game Twister. Instead of a mat marked with dots, there will be a color-coded map of the valley. Each color signifies a piece of land the trust protects.

Other View 22 artists have planned

"Poodle Ranch View" is by Travis Walker, one of the Jackson Hole Land Trust's View22 artists. He painted the view from the Four Lazy F Ranch.

holiday arts and crafts activities.

Travis Walker is bringing a letterpress for making cards, and Bill Sawczuk's drawings have been carved into woodblock stamps for decorating wrapping paper.

In addition to painting with oils, Lee Riddell works with watercolors. At her station she will demonstrate that skill and allow people to make watercolor greeting cards.

Jennifer Hoffman will show people how to build a snow globe. She has five pieces in the show.

Kay Northup is another View22 artist whose work is at the museum.

In addition to activities, the event will feature live music and six wine and cheese pairings.

Another perk the museum is offering is free limo service to and from the happening. Pickup will be at Town Square across from the Million Dollar Cowboy Bar.

Once the paintings come off the museum's walls they will be on sale through the land trust's office. A portion of the proceeds will fund the nonprofit's mission. For information, call 733-4707.
